Allen Dulles Sees Reds Unchanged

From the Herald Tribune Bureau

WASHINGTON, Oct. 9.—There is "not a bit" of difference between the way the Russians are now operating, with regard to intelligence and subversion, and their activities before their friendly approach to the West at Geneva, Allen W. Dulles, director of the Central Intelligence Agency, said today.

But United States intelligence activities overseas, as well as at home under the F. B. I., are second to none in the free world, he said in a televised interview with Rep. Kenneth B. Keating, R., N. Y., recorded here and televised today over stations WHAM-TV, Rochester, and WBEN-TV, Buffalo.

Soviet collection of data is good, through subversives as well as intelligence agents, Mr. Dulles said, but Russian analysis and evaluation "is probably not so good." As for Russian charges that United States agents are infiltrating behind the Iron and Bamboo Curtains, Mr. Dulles said he would neither confirm nor deny: that sometimes he thinks "they exaggerate a little bit but I'll let them say what they want on that score."
